This study examined the role of social support in mental health and well-being among geriatric populations. Using the theory of resilience, a structural equation model was created to evaluate how individual perception of social support, negative and positive social interactions (i.e., personal support and protective support) contribute to self-efficacy, resilience, and emotional well-being in an elderly sample (N = 216) in Mexico. The proposed model fit indices were good, except for the $\chi 2$ goodness of fit test, which was significant. Results indicated that social support was positively associated with self-efficacy, resilience, and emotional well-being. In turn, self-efficacy and resilience were also positively associated with emotional well-being. Finally, positive social interactions were positively associated with self-efficacy, resilience, and emotional well-being. Conversely, negative social interactions were only negatively associated with resilience. The results suggest that social support is a key factor in the elderly population, especially in those of low income. Implications for practice and further research are discussed.Your Grace Your Grace is a Christian title sometimes used as a way of addressing a supremely respected personage.
